The failure of isolated hepatocyte transplantation to affect liver function and survival in patients with cirrhosis may be attributed to their infusion through the splenic artery, rather than by direct injection through the splenic capsule, which is the route of engraftment successfully used in rodents . Given that it appears that cells need to engraft in an extrahepatic site, treatment of chronic liver failure might also benefit from work in tissue engineering and whole organ liver ...

Introduction. The principal obstacle to clinical transplantation today is the shortage of donor organs. For this reason, tissue engineering and regenerative medicine have become promising and important fields of research, which may offer new sources of tissues and organs for transplantation. Hepatocyte transplantation shows promise as a therapy to support liver function. We have previously shown that hepatocytes can be transplanted into prevascularized synthetic polymers in rat and pig models. This study was designed to assess the possibility of correction of a liver metabolic defect in a dog model.
